BEARLY Friendly

"Gosh, Petunia, I don't think we ought to go to Hidden Valley for our picnic," Cicero said worriedly one day. "Some friends of mine told me there are bears there!"

"Poo-hoo," Petunia smiled confidently. "That's just schoolyard gossip, Cicero. Besides," she said with twinkling eyes, "you make friends with other woodland animals so easily, I'm sure you could make friends with a bear, too, if one came along."

Reassured that all would be well, Cicero helped load the heavy picnic hamper into the car, and off they went.

When they arrived at Hidden Valley, Cicero dashed off into the woods to play.

"Hey, Petunia, see the bristly fellow I've made friends with," he called a short while later.

Petunia turned away from the wonderful feast she was spreading and gasped, "That—that's just fine," she managed to say. "But are you sure he won't be any trouble?"

"Of course not," Cicero grinned, stooping to pat the big porcupine he had brought out of the woods with him. "He just wants to play with me, and later on I'll share part of my lunch with him."

"I'll call you when it's ready," Petunia smiled, "but if I'd known we were going to have guests for lunch, I would have brought along more food."

Cicero and his new friend scampered away, and Petunia returned to her task, humming contentedly to herself.

A short while later Cicero returned once more. "Is lunch ready yet? I'm starved," he called. "I've made some more friends, and they're probably hungry, too."

"My goodness," Petunia chuckled as she glanced up and saw Cicero's new friends.

Besides the porcupine, he had brought a small deer, several squirrels, and an owl.

"We'd better start eating right away before you make friends with any more animals," Petunia chided, "or there won't be anything left for us."

They were all midway through the noon-time snack when the deer suddenly sniffed the air and bounded away into the woods. A moment later he was followed by all the other animals except the porcupine.

"Something's sure frightened them off!" Petunia said with alarm, hastily starting to repack the picnic hamper again. "Just to be on the safe side, we'd better be prepared to skedaddle, too!"

No sooner were the words out of Petunia's mouth than a huge brown bear ambled out of the woods, evidently curious to see what the picnic party was all about.

"Oh, oh!" Cicero gasped. "Here's a guest for lunch who invited himself!"

At the sight of the bear, the porcupine turned around, his sharp needles fanning upward with bristling menace. The bear stopped still in his tracks.

"That's fine, pal!" Cicero said softly to the porcupine. "You just hold him there for a minute while we get away."

Moving slowly, so as not to startle the bear Petunia and Cicero picked up the picnic hamper and retreated to the car.

"Whew!" Cicero sighed with relief when they were safely on their way home. "That sure was a swell picnic, and I made lots of new friends; but brother brown bear is one critter I wouldn't care to try my luck with. Anyway, there wouldn't be much point to it," he chuckled, "because, at most, he would only be bearly friendly!"
